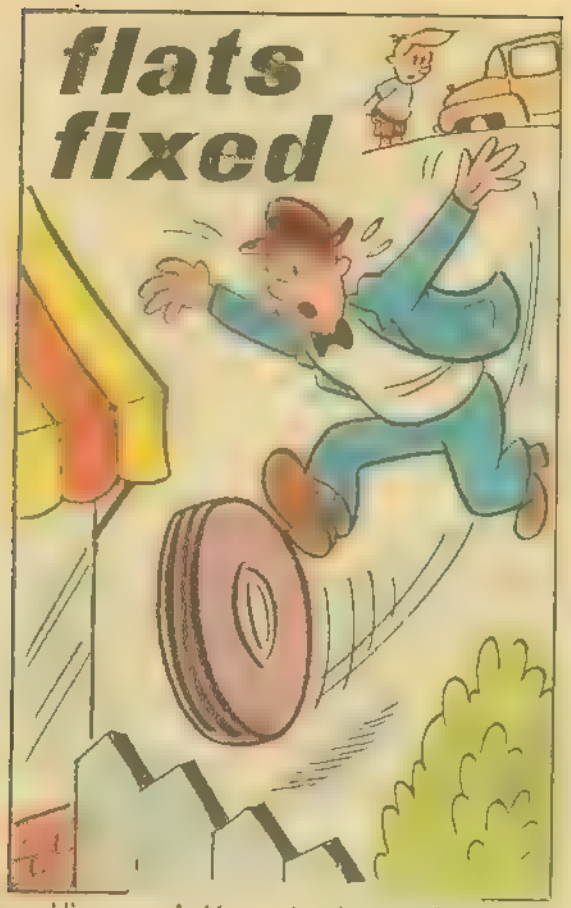
JOHNNEY



His name is Harry Applegate, but those who know him best call him "Helpful Harry"—and they don't always smile when they say it.

Harry was walking home at the time from "helping" some baby chickens into a tub of water. He thought they were ducks, and he was very surprised when the mother hen came squawking and pecking to make him stop giving her chickens a swimming lesson.

"Even chickens don't appreciate me trying to help them," he thought glumly. He brightened up, though, when he saw the man on the road with the flat tire. "Here's somebody who really needs my help," he thought.

"You having trouble?" he said cheerfully to the man.

It was a hot day and the man wiped sweat from his face. "Oh no," he said, "no trouble. I like to change tires. I do it every once in a while whether they need it or not."

Harry could tell the man was joking. He looked around to see what he could do to help. He picked up the automobile jack and started to hand it to the man: It was heavier than Harry had thought. It slipped out of his hand. It dropped on the man's toe. The man hollered, "Ouch!" and looked at Harry in a very unappreciative way. "Get out of here, kid," he said, "before I forget I'm a salesman and a gentleman."

Harry could tell the man was joking still, so he looked for something else to do to help him. While the man was jacking up the wheel, Harry rolled the spare tire close. The tire was pretty big and clumsy. It got out of Harry's hands and started rolling by itself down the hill. The man dropped everything and started chasing it. He caught it—but not before it rolled through a glass door into a grocery store.

When the man came back with the tire —after paying for the broken glass in the door—he found that Harry had let the jack slip, and the wheel-rim was down in the mud.

"Kid," the man said in a choked kind of voice, "I appreciate your trying to help me. But before you help anybody you want to find out if they need help, and if it's something you can do. Now if you don't get out of here in two seconds I'll call a cop."

The man got the tire bolted on finally, and let the jack down. The man and Harry both stared in surprise. With the weight of the car on it, the tire was squashed out flat!

The man ran his dirty hands through his hair, and down over his face. "Kid," he said, "you handed me back the same tire I took off! I've put the flat back on again! Now I've got it all to do over! Kid, I'm not going to wait for that cop—"

But Harry didn't wait for him either. He started running for home as fast as he could go, because this salesman had turned out to be like the rest—not appreciating his efforts to help.

The salesman watched him go, and shook his head. "I'll never come back to this town again, so help me," he muttered. "Not till this 'helpful' kid grows up and moves away."
